...WILSON folded one map and opened another. The hands of the clock moved to five, to half past, to six. The room grew hotter. Mrs. Wilson still slept. Cluny began to look about a little, and shift her feet under the table; unused to sitting still so long, she began to feel both restless and sleepy. But she controlled herself until the last map was put aside and Mr. Wilson looked up at her with a smile.

"This has been a quiet holiday for you," he said, "but I hope not a dull one."

"I like it here," said Cluny. "It's so peaceful."

He looked contentedly at the small bright room, at his mother dozing by the hearth. He said, "It's always like this in the evenings."

Why was it that at those words Cluny suddenly felt a pang? Was it the heat of the fire, had she sat too long after eating so large a tea? For whatever reason she looked at the clock and saw, almost with relief, that it was half past six.

"I must be going," she said. "I shall be late."

Mr. Wilson made no effort to detain her. He approved her conscientiousness. "The weather's cleared," he said. "It won't be an unpleasant walk. I'll come with you."

With genuine earnestness Cluny urged him not to leave his mother alone; but the chemist, born organizer that he was, had arranged for Mrs. Brewer to come across in precisely ten minutes. Though the road was safe and plain, he had no intention of permitting Cluny to walk home alone through the dusk. And he had, moreover, a positive intention as well, which he did not reveal until they were halfway up the Friars Carmel drive.

...Mr. Wilson,
 ...and have a word with Mrs. Maile."
