

Japanese Live Undisturbed on Dyke Adjoining Airport

Breach in Protecting Wall Could Cause Serious Damage

An order-in-council gazetted Tuesday night in Ottawa bars Japanese nationals from Vancouver's airport, but does not disturb most of 200 of Japanese origin living on the dyke that protects the airport from the sea, according to a survey made by The Vancouver Daily Province.

About 200 Japanese live a mile west of the airport on the edge of Sea Island facing the sea.

There are three communities in this area, the sites of Vancouver Cannery, Acme Cannery and Terra Nova, none of which has operated since 1930, according to an official of B. C. Packers.

Some of the old cannery buildings are used as warehouses, and the people were engaged in fishing until the end of the fall season.

There are two boat works adjacent to the fish camps, and a collection of tinner-dry sheds housing the Japanese families.

UNDISTURBED NOW

Under the regulations that bar Japanese nationals from the whole coastal area except with the express permission of the R.C.M.P., the Acme Cannery community would be affected, but the bulk of its population is totally undisturbed as yet by any security measures. Authority to apply the ban was created only on Monday and allows until April 1 for evacuation of the Japanese.

The order, published Tuesday in a special edition of the Canada Gazette, makes all airports used for the R.C.A.F. protected areas.

The order, which previously applied to R.C.A.F. stations now is extended to include airports operated in conjunction with R.C.A.F. units, company-owned elementary flying schools and R.A.F. observers schools, and R.A.F. schools of all sorts.

The move will give added control over the entry of persons to school areas and the Vancouver Airport.

COMPLAINTS MADE

Persons familiar with the airport have recently complained bitterly about the apparent unconcern of the authorities with the possibilities of sabotage or air attack of the Sea Island installations and the Boeing plant. It is pointed out that the landing field could be seriously damaged and rendered useless for a long time by saboteurs breaching the dykes that hold back the waters at the river mouth.

St. Lawrence Plan Advanced

By CHARLES BISHOP. From Daily Province Ottawa Bureau. (Copyright, 1942, by Southam Co.)

OTTAWA, Feb. 11.—Revival at Washington of the St. Lawrence Power and Seaway project suggests that, at long last, it may go through, now that it has been approved by the committee.

If it should be passed by Congress it would require ratification by Parliament here. Under the agreement, however, Washington must legislate first.

A new angle to the situation is that of "manpower." The main question would be not so much where the money is to come from as where the labor would be secured. This has regard to war industry and agricultural the needs of the armed forces, production. The materials required would be mainly cement.

One suggestion is that Japanese labor from British Columbia might be utilized.

No ratifying legislation will be considered here until Washington acts.
